dr. schlossmacher has been recognized for his work on frontotemporal dementia (ftd), including becoming the first to identify a protein, progranulin, linked to this disorder. he also has made important contributions to other disorders such as alzheimer's disease and parkinson's disease. he has developed a reliable method of diagnosing ftd, and has made important contributions to the diagnosis of other disorders, such as frontotemporal lobar degeneration (ftld). in 2010, he was awarded the society for ftd's distinguished career award. background: affective blunting is a core diagnostic feature of frontotemporal dementia (ftd). this symptom, however, may be difficult to quantify or characterize, particularly in early stages of the disease. clinicians need a measure that evaluates affective blunting in patients with ftd. this study evaluated the validity, sensitivity, and specificity of the emotional blunting scale (abrams and taylor, 1978) in ftd. this instrument measures lack of pleasure seeking behavior, affective blunting, and cognitive blunting on a 3-point scale. method: we administered the emotional blunting scale to 12 patients who met consensus criteria for ftd, 12 with alzheimers disease (ad), and 12 healthy comparison subjects. the three groups were comparable (ftd: 6 men, age 61.8 [sd = 3.9], education 14.2 years [sd = 3.4], mini-mental state exam 23.1 [sd = 3.1], cdr 1.6 [sd = 0.7]; ad: 6 men, age 65.5 years [sd = 3.5], education 13.9 years [sd = 2.6], mmse 22.5 [sd = 3.9 [sd = 1.0]; healthy comparison subjects: six men, age 63.8 years [sd = 4.8], education 14.6 years [sd = 3.4], mmse 29.3 [sd = 0.8]). results: the scale had convergent validity in that it corresponded with the clinical symptoms, and the inter-rater reliability for two independent raters was 0.83. there were significant overall group differences on the emotional blunting scale ( $f = 384.3$ ,  $p$
